After looking at the Burning Glass data, my ideal job choice hasn't changed but I have realised that in order to work in the IT industry I may have to be more flexible about which skills I develop in order to be able to secure a job in the future. I don't think this necessarily means that this data will drive me to pursue an entirely different course of study in terms of skills but maybe to branch out and learn a larger variety of skills in order to try find a balance between learning things I find personally interesting and things that will ensure employability.
